The Visual Content Journey

Building a visual presence for Al Rajhi Bank was never just about scheduled posts — it was about creating content that stops the scroll and builds a genuine connection with the audience. The work spanned static posts with a bold visual identity, three-part carousels that told stories through deliberate sequencing, and bento grid designs for richer, more organized content.

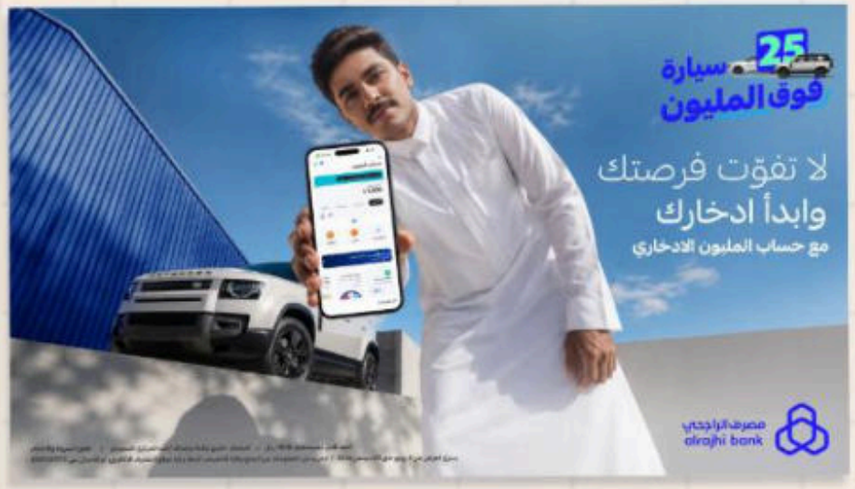

Every format was a deliberate choice, matching the message to the medium best suited to deliver it, from static design to motion, from a single idea to a complete visual system.

Where Beauty Meets Responsibility

Asir isn't just a tourist destination — it's a visual identity carrying a genuine national message. That's what made working with Asir Municipality a different kind of experience, one that went beyond design to shape the first impression of a city striving to be a tourism landmark worthy of its place within Vision 2030.

The work spanned several integrated tracks, each serving a different facet of the city: from awareness campaigns for the licensing system, to campaigns that build visual awareness and combat visual clutter to preserve the beauty of the urban landscape, through content that highlights the beauty of the city's parks and green spaces, campaigns that promote cleanliness as a community habit, and finally, designs supporting compliance and oversight systems with clarity accessible to both residents and visitors.

When the project called for animated visual content, I built the mood board for the motion scenes — a visual reference framework defining the colors, atmosphere, and overall visual tone that became the foundation for the scenes' animation journey.

These campaigns weren't scattered efforts, but a complete visual system — accompanied by multiple visual signature files, ongoing project development, and design reports that supported the tourism sector's growth in Asir, as part of a larger name journey toward achieving Vision 2030.

When Simplicity Becomes a Lifestyle

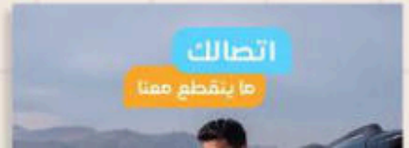

Urpay isn't just a digital wallet — it's an experience that redefines how a new generation relates to money: fast, smart, and closely tuned to everyday user behavior. Working with the brand meant embracing a completely different spirit from government-sector work: bold visuals, vibrant colors, and a design language that speaks casually and playfully to an audience that values simplicity above all.

The work involved constantly evolving content that matched the brand's fast pace: it started with static posts that translated offers and features with a playful touch far from traditional banking tone, and when content called for added energy, I built scenes in coordination with the motion designer to turn static ideas into vibrant visual experiences. I also designed for promotional offers close to the customer's everyday life, like Thursday deals — campaigns that tapped into simple daily moments and turned them into genuine engagement opportunities with the brand.

What set this experience apart was that design wasn't created in isolation from the market — it was a continuous response to fast-changing trends. Every campaign was a chance to reinvent the idea and keep the brand feeling fresh in the eyes of an audience that always expects something new.

When Support Becomes Part of the Story

Jahez isn't just a delivery app — it's part of a daily routine users rely on in small but recurring moments. That's what made joining the creative support team a chance to understand how trust is built with a customer who wants everything fast and effortless.

The role here was complementary rather than standalone: static designs supporting core campaigns with a clear, direct visual language that reflected the brand's identity and maintained consistency across daily content.

The role here was complementary rather than standalone: static designs supporting core campaigns with a clear, direct visual language that reflected the brand's identity and maintained consistency across daily content. Alongside that, I designed carousel offers that told the story of each promotion through a visual sequence close to the customer's everyday experience swiping through slides the way they'd swipe through an order list, finding another reason to engage with each one.

The goal wasn't just eye-catching design, but content that matched the app's own pace: direct, practical, and close to the customer's moment of decision.
